

Remuneration is not shared equally among different continents, countries, cultures, associations or even neighbours. Differences in monthly income can result in uncomfortable feelings: the better off may feel mistrust and fear; the less fortunate, bitterness and even anger. Any help is so often one-sided: on the one hand, while those that are better off are happy donate some of their money, they are often not keen to know what life looks like on the other side. On the other hand, recipients of donated funds are grateful for the support, while being acutely aware of their dependence.

Salary-share: what does it mean? Two people (families or even groups of people) with respectively high and low incomes agree a percentage of their income that they are happy to share. They agree the time frame over which to share part of their incomes and transfer the agreed percentage on a monthly basis into a joint basket of funds. These funds will then be spilt equally and both parties receive exactly 50% back. Those better off will receive less, while those worse off, will receive more money in return. In absolute terms, money is changing hands. But in terms of the individual participation, both parties are equal.

Salary-share's aim is to promote this idea as widely as possible. Our ambition is to both allow those who are happy to share to find one another, as well as to organise and foster salary-share communities. All our board members are bound by rules of client confidentiality according to Swiss law.
